INTRODUCTION

Medical education researchers regularly develop excellent, evidence-based innovations. Often, these innovations are implemented, yet fail. In our program, we witnessed varying levels of success with an assessment innovation. In this study we explored the reasons for varying levels of success with an innovation that was solidly grounded in evidence and theory.

METHODS

A multiple methods design was used. Using a grounded theory approach, we conducted focus groups with Family Medicine residents. Thirty-two 1st and 2nd year residents across 5 different teaching sites responded to a set of semi-structured questions. An "implementation fidelity" (the degree to which the innovation in action resembles the innovation in theory) inventory was also conducted, with data collected through quantitative analysis of use of the innovation at individual teaching sites.

RESULTS

Many residents who participated in our focus groups perceived substantial problems with the assessment innovation, which stem predominantly from 1) technical issues with the web-based portfolio, and 2) varying levels of preceptor involvement. In some instances, where preceptors sounded highly involved, residents voiced satisfaction with the innovation. Value was seen for learning and for guided self-assessment in sites where implementation fidelity was highest. Sites where champions of the innovation could be identified showed highest implementation fidelity and highest degree of resident perception of learning benefits from the innovation. Frustration with technical clumsiness of the web-based interface was seen for all sites.

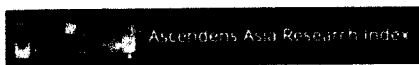

DISCUSSIONS

The results demonstrate the need for active preceptor involvement in any medical education innovation in order for the innovation to be effective. Learner-driven innovations will falter when preceptors do not take an active role in effective practice of innovations. Implementation fidelity was a constant factor in the success of the innovation.

FAQ

I am not a high school student but would like to showcase my research work, can I still join the RACE?

The conference is open to the public. Students, whether from public or private schools as well as professionals are invited to submit proposals for papers and may join the exhibit.

Do I need to submit the whole research paper?

No, entries must be submitted in a research abstract form. Below is a suggested abstract flow.

Introduction	25% of the space on importance of research	Begin by explaining to your readers what problem you researched and why the research is necessary. Convince readers that it is important that they continue to read. Discuss the current state of research in your field, expose a "gap" or problem in the field, and then explain why your present research is a timely and necessary solution to that gap.
Methods	25% of the space on what you did	Methods are usually written in past tense and passive voice with lots of headings and subheadings. This is the least-read section of an IMRaD report.
Results	35% of the space on what you found: this is the most important part of the abstract	Results are where the findings and outcomes of the research go. When talking about this data, we can think of the results as having two parts: report and comment. The reporting function always appears in the results section while the comment function can go in the discussion section. Make sure all tables and figures are labeled and numbered separately. Captions go above tables and beneath figures.
Discussion	15% of the space on the implications of the research	Discussion sections contain the following moves: 1. They summarize the main findings of the study. This allows readers to skip to the beginning of the discussion section and understand the main "news" in the report. 2. They connect these findings to other research 3. They discuss flaws in the current study. 4. They use these flaws as reasons to suggest additional, future research. 5. (If needed) They state the implications of their findings for future policy or practice.

What are the requirements for a research abstract?

Research Abstract must be in English (if in another language, there should be an available English-translated version). An abstract summarizes the key points of the manuscript in 150 to 450 words. The whole paragraph covers the Introduction, Methods, Results and Discussions of any of the following acceptable papers:

- | | | |
|-----------------------|-----------------------------|------------------------------|
| ✓ Thesis/Dissertation | ✓ Project Study (IT System) | ✓ Human Resource Development |
| ✓ Feasibility Study | ✓ Action Plan | Policy |
| ✓ Business Plan | ✓ Office Procedures | ✓ Investigatory Project |
